NEW SCULPTURE INSTALLED IN MAHNCKE PARK

Three new sculptures were installed in Mahncke Park on February 8. Placed under the shade of a large pecan tree across the street from 133 Parland Place, the three sculptures are the work of noted Texas artist Jesús Moroles whose sculptures with polished and natural granite surfaces are found in more than 2,000 public and private collections worldwide. In 2008, Moroles was awarded the National Medal of the Arts by President George W. Bush. Moroles died in an automobile accident in 2015.

No lighting was included as part of the recent installation. Signage for all three sculptures is expected to be added this month.

Placement of the Moroles pieces, the James Surls "White Walking Flower" sculpture, and the four sculptures by artist Catherine Lee in the east end of Mahncke Park near N. New Braunfels Avenue was authorized via an agreement between the Tres Centurias Foundation and the SA Parks Dept. The agreement allows the sculptures to remain in the park until December 31, 2021.

NEIGHBORHOOD HISTORY: LUDWIG MAHNCKE

Ludwig Mahncke was born in Mecklenburg-Strelitz (now Germany) on April 20, 1846. He married Katarina (Kemp) in 1871 and the couple had two daughters. The family left Germany and arrived in the U.S.A. in 1882, settling in San Antonio shortly after. Mahncke became a well-known hotelier and restaurateur – he operated the Mahncke Hotel at the NE corner of Houston and St. Mary’s Street. He was a popular figure in San Antonio business and social circles.

Mahncke served two terms as a member of the City Council and chaired the city’s parks committee. He was first appointed to the position of parks commissioner in 1901. Ludwig Mahncke was close friends with businessman and philanthropist George W. Brackenridge, and in 1899 he encouraged Brackenridge to donate to the city a tract of 199 acres along the SA River to be used as a park. As parks commissioner, the development of the site, later known as Brackenridge Park, fell to Mahncke, and he was directed to open the park immediately. Though he was first given a budget of only $2,500, he quickly developed a plan to create a “driving park,” and seven miles of roads were designed and constructed. A fenced deer preserve was built in 1902, and by 1906 enclosures were in place with bison, elk, goats, sheep, and fowl. While Brackenridge Park was Mahncke’s most well-known accomplishment, he was responsible for landscaping many public areas throughout San Antonio. Cypress trees transplanted from the Guadalupe River under his direction can still be seen today along the SA River.

Ludwig Mahncke succumbed to pneumonia on March 27, 1906. His funeral was described as one of the largest ever seen in San Antonio – hundreds attended and two wagons were required to convey all the floral tributes to the burial site. The newspaper reported that despite a heavy rain, a large funeral procession of police and fire department members, city and county authorities, honorary and active pallbearers, members of the societies to which he belonged, and many friends, followed the hearse down Avenue C (Broadway), Houston St., Alamo Plaza, and Commerce St. to City Cemetery 1 on the Eastside.

As a tribute to his friend, George Brackenridge donated to the city the land which connected Brackenridge Park to the former waterworks and its reservoir (present day Botanical Garden), asking that this parcel be named to honor his friend, Ludwig Mahncke. In memory of Mahncke’s public service, the Mahncke Monument Association raised funds and erected a memorial monument on January 17, 1909 with a bronze bust created by sculptor Pompeo Coppini, cast in Italy, and placed atop a large, pink Texas granite base. In 1964, Mahncke’s daughter, Mrs. Joseph Deutz, donated the park’s fountain to honor her father. In 2000, a Texas Historical Marker regarding Mr. Mahncke was placed in Mahncke Park, near Broadway & Parland Place.
